New York's White Elephant.

The announcement a few days ago of the withdrawal from business of the famous and colossal dry goods house of At. Stewart & Co., of New York, while causing the masses some exclamation of surprise, it appears was by no means startling to far-sighted business men of that city. It is been the growing conviction among many in the same line of trade in New York nearly ever since the death of Mr. Stewart that this celebrated establishment was not averaging a sufficient percentage on its sales to pay a respectable interest on the stupendous outlay necessary for the existence of such a business. Of course, the managers undertake to urge all sorts of excuses for bringing the operations of the concern to a close save the true one, which, as intimated above, is now generally conceded. Judge Hilton said recently to a newspaper reporter:

"The step now about to be taken was not contemplated until about six weeks ago when it suggested itself for the first time in the intercourse between Mr. Libbey and prizes myself. I had felt for a long time the exprizes 9 prizes myself. I had felt for a long time the excess of the burdens which I bear, but having assumed them in accordance with the wish of Mr. Stewart and with the contract of friendship which existed between us for so many years, I did not before see that I could lay them down without evading a sacred trust. I have long had enough care and responsibility to suffice for the strength, energy and vigilance of any ten men. Mr. Libbey is old, and as for me I am tired. We both want rest and a relief from care. I do not hope soon to find either, for besides this business, I have other great matters on my hands. What do you think of one man sharing in the direction of a great dry goods house, with its tributary mills, and five hotels and millions of dollars' of real estate? Think of the multitudinous duties which such a position imposes!"

This, of course, can never be taken as a sufficient reason for such a step, when it is considered how many responsible managers and sub-managers could have been procured at any time, and whose services we may rest assured would soon have been called into requisition had business justified it. At one time this establishment gave employment to about 12,000 persons; lately but half this number have been employed. In speaking of this class the Judge said : "Ah! that is the worst of all. It is sad.

sad, sad. I lay awake all of last night with that very thought. It is one that was most constantly with Mr. Stewart in the latter years of his life. People used to say to him. what will become of this grand establishment when you are gone, Mr. Stewart? It will be apt to go to decay and fall into ruins on top of those you leave behind you and who have been dependent on you so long. Then he would reply, 'I have provided for all that. Hilton will look out for that. The idea of severing the personal connections which had grown up around the house was painful to him, and it was the principal reason which determined him to leave the business in such a condition that it could be continued after his death. Mr. Stewart and his successors have always exercised a great care over his employes. If any of them becomes sick or dies destitute we provide for the subsistence of the sick or burial of the dead. This has always been the practice of the house. We do not make a boast of it, but we do it."

All this seems to stand in grim contrast with a certain biography of Mr. Stewart which says:

"He was sharp with manufacturers and producers and hard and grinding with his employees. * * " His theory was that the highest success would follow the greatest centralization; but to achieve this he mercilessly crushed and ruined all small dealers who were in any sense rivals.'

But the day has come when sensible people, just as willing to purchase what they want in one store as another, are not so much captivated by the glare and glitter of stupendous enterprise; and consequently this famous house, having outgrown itself, will shortly be numbered among the things of the past, and the large buildings, hotels, &c., be, as our heading suggests, white elephants indeed.

TEN CENTS ON THE DOLLAR .- The machinery of the American Book Exchange of On board the ears or steamboat in Alexandria, Va. New York, was sold Tuesday by order of April Nos. 79 & 152 King st., Alexandria, Va. the receiver. At a meeting of the creditors the merchandise liabilities were stated to be $60,000; there is due on credit cards about $30,000; due to newspapers throughout the country about $15,000, which with some miscelaneous debts make the total liabilities about $115,000. As to the assets it was said that there is $3,500 in bank, against which there are claims for $3,000. The stock of books on hand at list prices was $40,000, and it was decided to send them to the trade sales to be sold at auction. From the condi-Hon of the assets it was thought that the creditors would not realize more than ten cents on the dollar.
